The Endometrium as a Target for Contraception: 18 (Ernst Schering Foundation Symposium Proceedings)

Progesterone, the hormone "pro gestationem", plays a pivotal role in mammalian reproduction during almost all phases of the menstrual cycle and all stages of pregnancy. It is involved in the control of ovulation, prepares the endometrium for implantation, and, in later stages of pregnancy, is responsible for its maintenance by suppressing uterine contractility. The sudden withdrawal of progesterone action at the end of the nonfertile cycle leads to the constriction of spiral arteries and, in turn, to menstruation in human beings and non human primates. The decrease in serum progesterone concentrations or its functional withdrawal in the myometrium and decidua are the most important events during parturition in various mammals. In the uterus, progesterone controls the growth and differentiation of endometrial and myometrial cells and regulates a variety of cell functions directly by either stimulating or inhibiting structural and functional proteins, but also indirectly by functionally opposing estradiol action. In the nonpregnant uterus, there are different progesterone effects on uterine cell proliferation which vary among species. In the fertile cycle, progesterone regulates in synergism with estradiol the transport of the fertilized eggs and the cleavage stage embryos through the oviduct and induces the secretory changes in the endometrium required for implantation. During the period between ovulation and implantation, remarkable morphological and biochemical changes in the luminal and glandular epithelial cells take place under the influence of rising progesterone levels in the human and primate endometrium.
